Every industry is under increased pressure to reduce emissions, and the maritime world is of no exception. This presentation will first describe what these emissions are and the various sources of them, before examining how regulations will impact the maritime industry.

Accurately calculating emissions can be a complicated process and, using Shoreham Port as a case study example, the methodology for undertaking this task will be shown.

Finally, the various strategies ports and other maritime businesses can adopt to reduce their emissions will be analysed, along with the challenges associated with implementing them.
