Selwyn will explain that two thirds of container trade is in growing market outside of Europe. Terminals can capitalise by working smarter and more efficiently. There may be a labour issues to be resolved but automation may help to mitigate this. Remote processing and cooperation between Ports of Shipping Lines will be required to achieve to control trade targets. Brexit presents threats and opportunities but container ports will succeed if they rise to the challenge and invest for success.

Aart expects that irrespective of the final outcome, our Ports are essential for future growth of trade with the rest of the world. Ease of doing business with the UK will need to be supported by good port connectivity, reliable and green transport options and effective government regulations which need to be supported by digital systems. Ports already offer excellent connection worldwide but it is national infrastructure which needs further investment especially when Zero emission by 2050 is the target investment in developing digital visibility is required to achieve our trading ambitions and Government want to control trade from both fiscal and security perspective. Trading companies want control of their entire supply chain down to SKU level. Ports are in ideal position to deliver on this with their systems.
